R                      1989 SC1011 (14)

ACT:

Statutory standardised sentence-Absolute liability with mandatory minimum sentence of six months' R.I. of offender's guilt of sale of adulterated food, whether constitutionally bad, offending Articles 14, 19 and 21-Prevention of Food Adulteration Act, Section 7 read with Section 16, vires of.

Dismissing the Writ Petition, the Court

HEADNOTE:

HELD: Section 7 read with Section 16 of the Prevention of Food Adulteration Act is constitutionally valid. [257G]

Policy is for Parliament, constitutionality is for the Court. Protection of public health and regulation of noxious trade belong to the police power of the State and Legislation like the Prevention of Food Adulteration Act is of that genre. [256F-G]

If a sentence, as in the instant Act, is prescribed as a mandatory minimum and that is too cruel to comport with Art. 21 and too torturesome to be reasonably justifiable or socially defensible under Article 19, then a case for judicial review may arise. [256 G-H]

Judge-proof sentencing is not per se bad. Sometimes judicial fluctuations in punishment, especially on the softer side where white collar criminals are involved, induce legislative standardization of sentences, to avoid giving societal protection in hostage to fortune. There is a wide play still left for the Court, and mandatory minima are familiar from the days of the Penal Code. [256H, 257A]

The prescription of equal protection is not breached either, because within the range of judicial discretion the Court deals out to each what he deserves according to established principles. [257B]

Observation

- (a) Public authorities entrusted with the enforcement of regulatory provisions to protect society may, in proper cases, examine those prosecutions which are harassments to the humbler folk even if they technically violate the law and cause only minimal harm to society and decide whether they should at all sanction their prosecution. [257D-E]
- (b) The Legislature, in its wisdom, may also consider the advisability of resting power somewhere to reduce the sentence without the bigger offender escaping through these wider meshes meant for the smaller offenders. Even otherwise, there is a general power in the Executive to commute sentences and such power can be put into action on a principled basis when small men get caught by the law. [257E-F]

JUDGMENT:

ORIGINAL JURISDICTION: Writ Petition No. 449 of 1979 (Under Article 32 of the Constitution) R. K. Garg and D. K. Garg for the Petitioner.

The Order of the Court was delivered by KRISHNA IYER, J.-The adventurous petitioner imaginatively challenges the vires of Section 7 read with Section 16 of the Prevention of Food Adulteration Act and the relevant rules framed thereunder. The gravamen of his charge is that the above provisions, read together, impose an inflexible minimum sentence of six months R.I. of offender's guilty of sale of adulterated food, excluding in the process even the need to prove mens rea in the accused. This absolute liability, with mandatory sentence, dependent on sophisticated chemical tests and complicated formulae, is oppressively unreasonable in the illiterate, agrestic realities of little Indian retail trade. Such, in one sentence, is the submission of counsel.

The primary props to support this broad submission may be briefly noticed. Counsel complains that there is no classification as between injurious pollutants and innocuous adulterants while proscribing the sentence. Nor is there any intelligent differentiation between petty dealers and giant offenders, and vendors, big and small, are put on the Procrustean bed of stern punishment alike. Articles 14, 19 and 21 are the constitutional artillery employed by counsel to shoot down the said provisions of the Act.

Frankly, we are not impressed with the consternation about the constitutionality even if the potential for victimisation affecting smaller people may be real and elicit our commiseration. We may dwell for a moment on the latter grievance against the law a little later. First, we will repel the vice of unconstitutionality.

Let us be clear about the basics. Policy is for Parliament, constitutionality for the Court. Protection of public health and regulation of noxious trade belong to the police power of the State and legislation like the Prevention of Food Adulteration Act is of that genre.

If a sentence, as here, is prescribed as a mandatory minimum and that is too cruel to comport with Art. 21 and too torturesome to be reasonably justifiable or socially defensible under Art. 19 then a case for judicial review may arise. But we see none here. Nor can we agree that judge- proof sentencing is per se bad. Sometimes judicial fluctuations in punishment, especially on the softer side where white collar criminals are involved, induce legislative standardisation of sentences, to avoid giving societal protection in hostage to fortune. There is a wide play still left for the court, and mandatory minima are familiar from the days of the Penal Code (Vide Sec. 302). The prescription of equal protection is not breached either, because within the range of judicial discretion the court deals out to each what he deserves according to established principles.

Shri R. K. Garg feelingly urged that the poor and the weak, who are the larger, lower sector of retail traders, will have to suffer the standardised imprisonment if Food Inspectors can challan them in Court and, on some minor variation in the chemical composition of food sold, get them convicted sans mens rea merely because, along the chain, some bigger trader has fobbed off inferior commodities on them. We are disturbed that it is possible that small men become the victims of harsh law when there is no executive policy which guides prosecution of offenders. Petty victuallers and big sharks operate on society in different degrees and draconian equality will be tempered by flexible policy.

This is a matter of penal policy in constitutionality and so it is, in a sense, out of bounds for judicial advice. Even so, we feel constrained to state that public authorities entrusted with the enforcement of regulatory provisions to protect society may, in proper cases, examine those prosecutions which are harassments to the humbler folk even if they technically violate the law and cause only minimal harm to society and decide whether they should at all sanction their prosecution. The Legislature, in its wisdom, may also consider the advisability of resting power somewhere to reduce the sentence without the bigger offender escaping through these wider meshes meant for the smaller offenders. Even otherwise, there is a general power in the Executive to commute sentences and such power can be put into action on a principled basis when small men get caught by the law.

We dismiss the Writ petition since there is no constitutional invalidity made out and the grounds urged are more appropriately an appeal to the Parliament and the Executive.

V.D.K.

Petition dismissed.
